

Advanced Biomaterials

Materials that substitute or imitate biological functions are expected to be applied to cutting-edge medical technologies such as artificial organs, drug treatment, and regenerative medicine. Lectures will be given on methods for artificially designing and constructing such biomaterials using polymers. At the same time, we will explain the recognition and response mechanisms between biological materials at the molecular and cellular levels, thereby deepening our understanding of the essence of biological functions.